COMMENTS
(8.3, 8.13) PRC generally requires all employees to attend live ethics training every year. This includes employees whose training requirements could be met through interactive training. It also includes employees who would not be required to receive any training had PRC not exercised its discretionary authority to require all employees to attend annual ethics training. While creating a significant additional burden for ethics officials, providing live training to all employees every year helps foster a higher degree of employee engagement and awareness of ethics-related issues. Consequently, employees are better able to identify and avoid conflicts of interest as well as Standards of Conduct violations. Extraordinary circumstances prevented four employees from attending PRC's live ethics training sessions. (OGE's training regulations generally would have required that only two of the four receive training.) PRC ethics officials provided all four employees with the presentation slides used to conduct live training, believing they qualified as interactive training. Because of a minor technical issue, OGE determined that the presentation slides did not qualify as interactive training. However, OGE acknowledges that the slides were used only as a secondary method of providing training to a very limited number of employees while the agency exceeded basic requirements by providing live training to virtually its entire staff.
